PRODUCER'S NOTE

Far too often the production of a play by Bertolt Brecht is a signal for an academic discussion of his dramatic theories and a chance for self styled critics to display their own erudition. Lost in this welter of controversy is the inescapable fact that he was essentially a writer of the theatre. "The Caucasian Chalk Circle," often quoted as an example of the epic theatre, is really a series of semi romantic scenes loosely strung together telling a simple plot which is contrasted with the amoral and riotous tale of Azdak, the corrupt and cowardly thief who by a quirk of fate becomes a judge of that very society which he despises.

The play is vulgar, romantic, humorous and absurd in turn; this is because it is about people; and people are, and always have been, vulgar, romantic, humorous and absurd.

If this production appears illogical, a mixture of styles, disjointed and occasionally improvised, it is because it is about life, and life is like that. We have tried to interpret what we think Brecht wanted his play to show to an audience. Whether you agree or disagree we hope you will be entertained.
